Admission: $8 general (free to low-income)

http://www.metrocinema.org/film\_view?FILM\_ID=1295

"Valuable as a peek inside the subculture or as a guide of sorts, this video documents the Portland zine scene and its inhabitants... the passion and dedication of these folks is undeniable. Can most of us say that about our work? As hobbies go, zine creation is both fulfilling and grueling. Distribution is as a dicey proposition as creation, often yielding no cash but plenty of gratification. Like the most big-budget documentaries, $100 inspires curiosity and interest. Shot and edited in the same DIY spirit as the zines it covers, this DVD is a winner. - Chimpanzee

"Like a good zine, the documentary is high quality (the video and audio are top notch with smart music and graphics) without being slick. Mostly this is a film of talking heads talking about themselves, their work, and the bigger picture. It's good to see zines getting the same documentary treatment that music has long received. A few stories are illustrated by "dramatic recreations" that are surprisingly charming, not annoying. The credits note that this production was assembled using only borrowing materials - very cool indeed." - Punk Planet #73

http://www.metrocinema.org/film\_view?FILM\_ID=1297

A hilarious series of short films produced by artists who unapologetically infringe on copyright as their means of creative resistance to corporate culture. The ten short videos being presented appropriate intellectual property, whether through the use of found footage, unauthorized music, or shots of copyrighted or trademarked material. Some of the pieces in the show have eluded lawyers; others have had to appear in court. Illegal Art celebrates "degenerate art" in a corporate age. A must-see for lovers of culture-jamming. NOTE to multi-national corporations: This is FAIR USE under artistic license!
